

"After the acute therapy of a prostate carcinoma, which as a rule has not caused the patient any discomfort, very stressful problems often arise for the patient due to the immediate consequences of the previous therapy. First and foremost are urinary incontinence and erectile dysfunction. But also wound healing disorders, the restriction of physical performance and, last but not least, the psychological problems in dealing with the diagnosis of "cancer" often give patients the impression that the "big end" will only come when the cancer has already been eliminated.

This is where the work of rehabilitation comes in, by improving and, in the best case, eliminating the physical problems through targeted training, education and special therapies. Through the possibility of psycho-oncological discussions, we also provide assistance in coping with the psychological and social problems. In this way, oncological rehabilitation serves to ensure the success of the actumedical therapy."
